

Dark art

Ditch the liquid liner – eyes have had a 90s grunge-over. We saw heavily pencilled waterlines on the Rag & Bone catwalk, while at Prabal Gurung it was smoked out with shadow. At Coach, shadow was smudged under the lash line for a slept-in look. Two words: sex kitten.

The glitterati

Every season, we think we've reached the limit of what you can do with lipstick. And then make-up artist Pat McGrath blows our minds again. At DKNY, she pressed loose glitter over a matching shade of lipstick for spring's most Instagrammable pout. But if you're not Blue Peter-level crafty or are worried about ingesting ten teaspoons of glitter, try patting a loose metallic eyeshadow on top of lip balm instead. We know this is never going to be a safe, office-appropriate look, but it can be incredibly cool for a night out when paired with nothing but squeaky-clean skin and a cat-eye flick on the lids.

Molten manis

The monotony of nude nails has finally been broken! The beauty world is busting out the big guns with metallic-toned manis, as seen at Mimi Wade and Philipp Plein, where mirrored gold gave a whole new meaning to shiny nails. But the trend we're trying, shown here at 3.1 Phillip Lim, is a shimmery segue into full-on summer metallics. Madeline Poole, Sally Hansen's global colour ambassador, randomly swiped Miracle Gel in Buffalo Nickel over an opaque, neutral base. 'Starting with a layer of white or nude is a trick manicurists use if they want to brighten a metallic, or make it look more distressed,' she says. ▶
