Eyeliner as imperfect, playful markings? Praise be. Yes, actual black liner smudged underneath the eyes is a look, thanks to Dior's creative and image director Peter Philips, who used the Diorshow Khôl in Black along the lower waterline, stretching it to the inner and outer corners of the eyes. 'I asked the girls to squeeze their eyes closed just after I applied it, so it looks like day-after make-up,' he says. A cluster of graphic squiggles on the sides of the eyes, inching up to the temples, finished the look. At Rochas, winged liner looked like it was floating, and models were sent down the Dries Van Noten catwalk with jet-black swatches across their lids that could have been drawn on with a giant marker pen.

GYM SKIN

If the SS19 catwalks taught us anything, it was how to achieve skin with a magical hyper-real 'aliengelic' sheen – aka your post-spin class glow, minus the sweat. At Victoria Beckham, complexions were prepped using the Foreo UFO Mini Smart Mask, before gloss was applied to the eyes and Pat McGrath Labs' Nude Shiny Stick Highlighter + Balm Duo was dabbed on to cheekbones and the Cupid's bow. At Balmain, the vibe was more 'sexy athleisure', as peachy blusher and sculpting powder propped up well-moisturised skin. While Alexa Chung transformed her backstage area into a pop-up spa, complete with Gankin facial massage. 'By applying pressure to the face, you can stimulate blood flow around the eyes and lymph drainage, plus release tension in the facial muscles and add definition to your bone structure,' says Shumana Begum from Suquq, who has popularised the technique. A pop of strong highlighter and absolutely no foundation finished the look. One less product to use? Sign us up.
